Some Girl(s)* a show about couples to set couples talking

We've all been in a relationship at some point in our lives; almost all of us have been through a breakup. CentrStage's second show of the year, Some Girl(s) takes a funny yet painfully truthful look at that constant battle of the sexes that we call romance.

This production brings together a talented and diverse cast including Megan Jolly, a past graduate of the Performing Arts course in Launceston who has been working in both London and San Francisco for a number of years as teacher, director and event manager.

Megan has recently returned to Launceston to raise her family and further her studies. She claims the audience will find the play painfully relevant.

'Anyone who has been in a relationship will relate to some of these situations,' she said.

"But be warned; if you come see this show with your partner you will leave the theatre arguing."

Some Girl(s), written by Neil LaBute and directed by Michael Edgar, is unusual because it has a predominately female cast.

Some Girl(s) runs from the 18th - 21st March at the Annexe Theatre, Inveresk. Tickets can be booked through The Princess Theatre, Ph. (03) 6323 3666.
